On returning from a recent excursion to the West, I find that Mr. George R. Gliddon and the Editors of the New World have been amusing the public leaving the city. It is now nearly two years since these men commenced their unprovoked and libelous attacks upon me, which they have continued up to this time with singular bitterness, though I have to abuse me; and, until lately, I have treated the whole matter with contempt. Circumstances have, however, transpired recently, which seem to render it necessary r may the more readily understand and appreciate the

Mr. Gladdon, then U.S. Consul for Cairo, being on an excursion in Upper Egypt, and, at that time, at the Cataracts, came durance of his company," says Mr. Glidon, "even on the sindy beach at Aswan, or amidst the ruins of Elethyas, Edfor, or Thebes, Mr. Cooley was indebted solely to my respect for the parties he was with."*

I had, certainly, very respectable and agreeable companions;

I had, certainly, very respectable and agreeable companions; but neither they nor myself obtruded on the retirement of Mr. Gliddon. The advances were, in every instance, made by himself; and, I may say, that it would not, probably, have occasioned any serious amount of grief, on our part, even had Mr. Gliddon stitled himself upon the dignity of his "official station," and not notneed us at all. For one, however offensive might have been my company to Mr. Gliddon, I had certainly full as much of his society as I desired—it was no ratity—norat that time considered by either my companions or myself any great delicacy. He acted, however, with apparent succents, and were low no means disposed to make a discourtieous return for his civilities. I endeavored to treat him with pollateness while in Egypt; and when about to publish my book on that coentry, inserted the following complimentary paragraph of Mr. Gliddon, in grateful remembrance of our acquinitions: "We were too our arrival at the catamots of the Nile immediately waited upon by George R. Mr. Gliddon, though a foreigner, who—as he says:—" never

Mr. Gliddon is quite right if he supposes me not to be what is called a "impring character?" though after the provicetions he has throe in in my teeth, the wonder has renerally been that he had not been attacked long ago. I have, ho wever, never sought an interview with him,—on any occasion,— and, although for nearly two years, he has in his almental occaption through the United States, attempted to whity and calumnate my character; to the extent of his "feeble abidties." I have suffered him to proceed with his unprincipled shuse unnoticed. I might have still permitted him to go on unmolested had he not accisentally crossed my path—for, saide from the otherne all attention he has attracted in this country, I consider Mr. Gliddon's standing beneath contempt, But, in an evil hour, we did, by the nexest chance in the world

Those who will take the trouble to peruse Mr. Gliddon's pamphate will, doubless, coincide with the opinion of "his own and his father's personal friends," to whom he ubmitted the disgraceful production, "the Appendix to the American in Egypt," in manoscript, and who, with one accord, endeadored to dissuade him from the sucial course he mediated. Al. His grand fundamental error was in not taking the advice of his friends. But Mr. Gliddon—like imany others of his adveaturous countrymen, similarly circumstanced—was desirous to brigg hinself, at a bound, consejicously before the public. He, at that time, contempanted delivering a course of innermal inectures in the United States, in which he was to assorish the New World with the mysterias he professed to have unveited during a trumpeted twenty one year residence in Egypt. He, therefore, deciment it essential to the success of his career in America, to attempt to dazzle at once—to impress the public atid in advance, strongly in favor of his sprightly parts. He went therefore to press;—and he has already gathered sue portion of the fruits of his labors. He reposes on his laurest, My only with is, now to disabuse the public mind in regard to my connection with him. Mr. Gliddon aminiby observes in his pamphite, that, "our relative positions have been, and, so its as may denead on him, will remain perfectly distinct; for consideration of the fruits of his labors.
